

Alexandria Gazette

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 4, 1878.

THE YELLOW FEVER.—A correspondent of the New York Herald, giving his experience as a nurse in Memphis, says:

"I must confess I grew to be exceedingly cautious. I never thought of dying, but I did not care whether I lived or died. I saw men dying all around me—in the next bed, opposite me as I lay on my cot—everywhere. I scarcely had a thought for myself. But I never believed I was going to die. Few persons believed they would die when they were first seized with the disease; but, as a rule, they were aware of it before the last moment came. In some cases they predicted the time of death almost to the minute. Then again, nearly everybody who had not the malady expected to escape it altogether. I asked a physician if he expected to escape the fever, and he said, certainly. Two days he was dead. The policeman, black and white, ran away—a fact, which I mention simply to show how prevalent was the idea of flight. Some men had an idea that hard drinking would save them, and the two liquor saloons which were open did a thriving trade. The epidemic contradicted all rules. It was always thought before that drinking men could not escape death if the fever once seized them; but in Memphis men of regular lives died by the thousand while drunkards survived. A book might be written on this phase of the epidemic."
